I loved Forty Shades of Pearl. I really identified with the characters. It managed to capture the passion and essence of the intensity of first love, although the main character, Pearl, is a forty year-old divorcee and her protagonist, Alexandre is twenty-five. The relationship is charged, intense and all-consuming - we are not sure if it because of the physical attraction they have for each other or a deeper, more spiritual connection. Either way, we are hooked by the story-line and premise. If Arianne Richmonde writes book two I would read it to find out more about this interesting pair. This unlikely match makes for compulsive reading. Pearl Robinson is my kind of heroine - deliciously attractive and smart - strong yet vulnerable. Not that Forty Shades of Pearl should be compared to Fifty Shades of Grey as it is an entirely different story, but I will make a comparison anyway, simply because it is also an adult romance so the two books do have that in common. Although I enjoyed a couple of the sex scenes in FSoG I put the book down the second the BDSM thing started to overtake the novel. For me, that was so NOT a turn-on, it really put me off. Also, I simply didn't find it interesting. I think women out there must be under the impression that we guys want to spank and whip them, when in reality (I speak for myself and men I know) - nothing could be further from the truth. That's why I loved Forty Shades of Pearl. Yes, there is power play (Alexandre Chevalier is sexually dominant in his way) but the thread of it is more subtle. There is more intrigue. The book is also very well written both on an emotional level and in its descriptions. It makes you feel you are there, too, which is the point of a really great read. I also enjoyed the dialogue. This novel has it all.
